2023

Native Voices & 7th Generation Books

Native Voices Books published its first book in 1978 with the release of Akwesasne Notes' Basic Call to Consciousness. Now in our 35th year, we are delighted to announce the acquisition of Cherokee Publications. As a longtime distributor of their books, it is a pleasure to continue offering these valuable classics to readers. We also distribute Crazy Crow's collection of traditional arts and crafts books.

7th Generation works with Indigenous authors and artists whose talents and wisdom create culturally authentic works of fiction and nonfiction that provide young people with both factual and historical representations of Native Americans.

Of special interest this year is the publication of the Taos Pueblo Four Seasons board books by the Taos Pueblo Tiwa Language Program. The books are intentionally text-free so that anyone can use them to teach young children their Native language.

Celebrate Native heritage with our line of children's books that provide endearing Indigenous tales along with gorgeous full-color pictures.

The twenty-nine compelling titles in the PathFinders collection of hi-lo young adult novels provide a glimpse into the lives of both historical and present-day Native American teens. The Native Trailblazers Series features powerful, inspiring biographies of contemporary Native American and Indigenous changemakers.

We recommend these culturally accurate and engaging titles for classrooms, libraries, and booksellers to help children, young adults, and teachers discover and appreciate the richness and diversity of Indigenous cultures.

I hope some of them find a home on your bookshelf.

Sincerely,
Kathie Hanson

FATHER EAGLE AND THE HUNTER

Alfreda Beartrack-Algeo

- ◆ Ancestral intertribal story taking place in a time of looming starvation and drought.
- ◆ This story was originally shared with the author by a Cheyenne elder.

Native people have a special bond with the Eagle nation that holds true today.

When the hunter spotted a tall tree, he climbed to the top and discovered a nest with three eaglets. “What a tasty soup the three little birds will make!” thought the hunter.

Hearing the eaglets’ cries, Father Eagle flew to their rescue. Father Eagle told the hunter that if he did not take the eaglets, he would ask the Great Spirit to help the village.

Father Eagle soared high into the sky and soon returned. He told the hunter that the Great Spirit would help his people and not let his village perish.

From that day forward, the game was plentiful, the people flourished, and the eagle was forever respected and honored.

The lovely Hunku (First Woman) was immortal and never aged. The animals and plants loved her, but she was lonely. Every day she would go to the riverbank and cry herself to sleep. Beaver, who lived in the river, fell in love with the beautiful Hunku and begged the Great Spirit to turn him into a man.

Beaver became Takahe (First Man), but the Great Spirit told him that one day he would have to go back to being Beaver. Hunku and Takahe had four beautiful daughters who moved to the North, South, East, and West.

The day came when Beaver returned to the river. Hunku asked the Great Spirit to turn her into a tree so her long roots would always be close to Beaver. The Great Spirit agreed to her request, and to this day you will find cottonwood trees living near bodies of water and beavers living near cottonwood trees.

All Cherokee children have heard the story of the magic lake where sick and wounded animals would go for healing. A great hunter, Walk the Forest, pursues a huge black bear in the Smoking (Smoky) Mountains. He wounds the bear and pursues him for days. Walk the Forest falls asleep and wakes to see a shimmering lake with animals swimming and bathing in the mysterious waters. The bear is now magically healed. Thunder booms and the voice of the Great Spirit tells Walk the Forest to instruct his people that they must never follow wounded animals to the lake—or else their game will vanish, and the lake will dry up.
